The Caledonian Railway

The "Caley" was the foremost of the Scottish pre-grouping companies, reflecting the Saltire flag with its blue locomotives and by its adoption of both the "Lion of Scotland" and the Ancient Royal Arms of Scotland to adorn its locomotives, carriages, buildings, company documents, etc.

The Act of 31 July 1845 establishing the Company as "The Caledonian Railway", included the absorption/amalgamation of a number of existing lines. With the other lines incorporated on the same day, in one gigantic piece of co-ordinated railway planning, all engineered by Joseph Locke, his London to Carlisle line was extended to Glasgow, Edinburgh, Aberdeen, Dundee and Greenock.

The line opened on 10 September 1847 from Carlisle to Beattock and from Beattock to Glasgow and Edinburgh on 15 February 1848. It met the northern lines on 7 August 1848.

By 1866 the Scottish Central and Scottish North Eastern Railways had been absorbed by the Caledonian, which continued to develop many lines within the coal and iron fields of central Scotland, extended its rail heads to Ardrossan, Wemyss Bay, Gourock, Oban and Ballachulish on the west coast and built Grangemouth docks on the Forth following its acquisition of the Forth & Clyde Navigation.

The development and operation of the steamer fleet on the Clyde was as dynamic and colourful as the development of the railway itself.

Among the many notable stations built by the Company Glasgow Central station was, and is still today, considered as one of the finest in the UK.

With one of the most severely graded mainlines in the country and ever-increasing train weights the Company always had a requirement for reliable and powerful locomotives. With Drummond and McIntosh as locomotive superintendents the Caledonian Railway locomotive acquired legendary status.

The Caledonian Railway was absorbed into the London Midland and Scottish Railway in the Grouping of 1923.
